Samsung SDI

Set to take share from Chinese competitors

Maintain TP of W1,000,000 and retain as our top pick

We maintain our target price of W1,000,000 for Samsung SDI and retain the stock as our top pick within the sector. We expect the company to begin taking market share from Chinese and Korean rivals in both the North American ESS and European EV markets. In North America, Samsung SDI's agreement to acquire GM's stake in the Indiana battery joint venture should pave the way for a full-scale shift toward ESS production, supporting order momentum. In Europe, we expect the company to secure prismatic LFP battery orders from Volkswagen and several other customers in 2H26. Samsung SDI's ability to pursue orders and capacity expansion more aggressively than global competitors is supported by its ample financial resources, its competitiveness in prismatic batteries, and increasingly stringent restrictions on Chinese battery suppliers.

North America: ESS order momentum set to accelerate

Samsung SDI's acquisition of GM's stake in their Indiana battery joint venture should alleviate one of the firm's key weaknesses: its limited US production capacity. We expect the company to acquire the entire facility, originally planned as a 36GWh EV battery plant, at below book value. Assuming that it converts two of the lines to LFP ESS production, the facility could provide an additional 20–24GWh of capacity. We expect order intake to accelerate meaningfully once the company formally announces the line conversions. Of note, after Samsung SDI first announced plans in 3Q25 to convert EV battery capacity to ESS production, it secured multiple North American ESS orders.

Set to gain share in the European EV market from Chinese rivals

During its 2Q26 conference call, Samsung SDI stated that it expects to secure prismatic LFP battery orders from multiple European OEMs in 2H26. We expect these to include projects already under discussion with Volkswagen and other leading European OEMs. At least two line conversions are underway at the Hungary plant, and we believe the resulting capacity should allow the company to capture meaningful market share by volume. A Korean battery maker gaining share from Chinese suppliers in Europe—not just in the US—would have been difficult to envision only a few years ago.

Financial strength, prismatic competitiveness, and tighter China regulations

Samsung SDI's ability to secure substantial orders and market share relative to competitors is underpinned by its ample financial resources, its competitiveness in prismatic batteries, and tighter restrictions on Chinese battery suppliers under measures such as the US's OBBBA and Europe's proposed Industrial Accelerator Act. While Samsung SDI was a late mover in the previous cycle, it is emerging as a frontrunner in the current cycle. Accordingly, we reiterate Samsung SDI as our top pick and believe investors should also pay attention to the company's value chain.
